Dear Ms. Dorich,

Veterans go to war, they don't think of the FCC or how important it is to fight for freedom of ideas as it is for freedom of speech or religion or right to assemble. If they did think of how important it is to protect our right, if not duty, to let ideas become examples for; employ our people and strengthen our economy. So, I write you today as someone who has served our Nation, and someone who believes that a roll-back maneuver in this case would be tantamount to splitting on a man or woman who willingly laid down their life to protect our flag.

Veterans in all branches of our armed services would be shocked if they thought that while they fought to protect everyone's chances at achieving the American Dream that some government pencil pusher was back in Washington picking the winners and losers in America's economy just because they think they know what's best. That's not socialism or communism but it's surely an ugly display of a government too big and wasteful for its own good.

I support free market principles and low taxes. I think that's what is needed to fix job creation exports where business owners are given a chance to keep growing their businesses. But right now we're watching LightSquared get hung up in the maze of government that has brought down so many great ideas and companies. If you can't see that we need to let them create jobs by getting out of their way, not telling them they can't come up with an idea and try to get America on board at any cost. We've gone to war with countries who have done just that and our men in uniform have died to make sure our country can always have the ability to do that.

As a Veteran I think how private sector technology can be applied to preparing and fighting wars. Many times the military provides the private sector with the new idea. I'd hate to see this broadband plan be scrapped only to be used as a blue print by our enemies. To aide them while hurting our people who need new jobs would be something we could never forgive and something America can't afford right now.

Sincerely,
